

Tonopah Range: Western Stories

ALAN LeMAY
Tonopah Range
Western Stories

Missouri Sloper and Elmer Law, having given up their range riding jobs to wander, have drifted into the desert town of Molech. With the wind blowing from the southeast, a dark sulphurous cloud has descended upon the town from the nearby smelter so that everyone heard the shots that killed Walt Rathbone, but no one saw the killing. When Sloper stumbles over the fallen man, he and Law carry him to the saloon and would have been lynched for his murder if Horntoad Holt hadn't intervened.

Horntoad Holt, Walt Rathbone, and Andry Dundee were all ranchers on Tonopah Range. When they discovered a rich copper deposit they decided to work it together, calling it Three Brand Mine. Recently, the partners had come to a disagreement over what to do with the mine. Dundee wanted to sell it, Holt wanted to continue to work it and Rathbone couldn't decide which plan was best, and many think he was killed by one of the other partners because he had finally made up his mind. Despite the danger and Law's opposition, Sloper decides to stop drifting long enough to discover the identity of the murderer.

In addition to "Tonopah Range," five of LeMay's short stories round out this offering. Each is written with all the fabulous vitality of the West.
